Background and context

Civil Society Europe, the coordination of civil society organisations in Europe, gathering around 30 civil society networks and platforms active in diverse areas such as civic participation, human rights, social policy, education, culture, the environment, transparency, international cooperation, youth, organises a European Civic Academy since 2016. The first edition was held in La Rochelle, France and a second one in 2017 in Brussels, Belgium. The aim of the ECA is to bring together activists and leaders of civil society organisations with academics and researchers from all over Europe (including the Black Sea Region) to discuss societal challenges relating to civil society and democracy.

Europe has gone through important changes during these last years and civic freedoms are now threatened in several countries of the European Union. The emerging of « illiberal » democracies, the rising of populist movements has created a difficult climate for independent civil society organisations. In particular, the rule of law is challenged in a number of countries and European Values are attacked while anti NGO laws are adopted and smear campaigns are directed against civil society.

In this context, Civil society Europe would like through the organisation of a dedicated European Civic Academy to give activists key insights into these developments and concrete tools on how to address them. Building partnerships between the academic world, and civil society is ever more needed.

The 2019 edition will take place in a particular context with both the European elections and uncertainties around the impact of Brexit.

The organising committee proposes to focus this year's academy on the impact of populism on civil society, exploring current literature and practice and perspectives ahead.

After a first session on the situation of civil society in Poland as a case study for Europe, participants will participate in a key note session on populism, Euroscepticism and civic space which will entangle this phenomenon from multiple perspectives, including the voice of Europeans that are adhering to populist narratives.

The different facets of populism, the impact on civil society and on Europe will be then discussed in different thematic workshops led by both academics and civil society experts in a world café style.

Also participants will adopt a declaration to decision makers ahead of European elections which will include a section on research recommendations.

The results of the discussions will feed into a conference report, and article for scientific publication.
